Dogs destined for the fight pit are carefully watched from puppydom. A litter of bull terriers may furnish several promising fighters and these are separated when they are very young, as the pugnacious instinct develops early in life. The future champion fighter is allowed to have many combats while still a puppy but the careful trainer sees that a crushing defeat is never sufered, for this would take the courage of the dog and would make him useless for a prize pit. The prime essen-tial for a good fighting dog is perfect teeth, for in the last analysis it is the dog's ability to hold on "with the tecombats. The teeth must be even, and must meet exactly. A fighter is ready for his prize encounter when he is two years old, and the length of his fighting days is dependent almost entirely upon endurance, the strength of his opponents and the number of fights for which he is matched. A dog, even if vigorous frequently comes out of the pit with a crushed leg, lacerated throat or with one eye gone. Last Public Dog Fight,

One of the last great public dog fights held in this country was that which determined an interstate championship, the contesting dogs being the famous Kentucky terrier "Crib" and the New York fighter "Pilot," The fight was held within five miles of Louis-ville, Kentucky, in October, 1881, and $1000 had been posted by each side and the preliminaries were carried out with all the precision of some great ceremony of state. Hard to Separate. In handling bull terriers it is almost impossible to separate the two dogs after they have fastened their teeth in each other. There are only two successful methods-one to choke the dogs into insensibility and the other to pry they jaws apart with a wagon spoke or some similar wecoon. The latter method has the disadyantage of frequently breaking the dog's teeth, of course cripples him in all future

Dog pits are seldom found in these days, so vigilant have the officers of the S. P. C. The pits vary in size from a boarded arena 15 feet long by 10 feet wide, and 30 inches high to a square eight by eight, or a circle not only for dog fights but for rat killing contests, in which each dog is supposed to kill one rat for every pound of his weight. One writer said it was hard to judge Thompson's has not been abolished, but only driven quality "because no man can make good or make attractive play against an opponent like Unholz, who half the time had his head between his knees." Of Jimmy Clabby, there sems to be no two opinions. He is voted the most graceful, most talented and most effec tive boxer that has been seen in Aus-
